After several months of living with wounds that would not heal, Pamela was very frustrated and in need of long-term acute care. She had been suffering from a severe bacterial skin infection for six months, and her situation was further complicated by chronic swelling of her lower extremities and recurrent cellulitis on her legs. After several hospital admissions and a one month stay at a Madison, Wisconsin hospital, Ms. Johnson's wounds still were not healing well. She was transferred to LifeCare Hospitals, known for its successful wound care program. With the help of the hospital's wound
